Britain's menu of misery

Brexit The Irish border dilemma shows the trade-offs that Brexit requires: leader, page 12. The government's concessions have not killed off the dangerous idea that Britain could walk away, page 48. Two new books suggest that Britain faces some singularly unappetising choices: Bagehot, page 50

Migrants in Beijing Officials are using brutal tactics to limit the city's population. They are wrong even to try: leader, page 14. In the capital, scandals bridge a social divide, page 28

CEOs and politics Chief executives are under increasing pressure to take a stance on social issues. How should they respond? Leader, page 12. Employees are leaving bosses with little choice but to mount the barricades, page 53. What if the unwashed masses got to vote on companies' strategies? Schumpeter, page 59

Forests The steady expansion of tree-covered land in rich countries is not always popular. It will continue all the same, page 51

European banks Much has been done to strengthen Europe's banking system. But not enough: leader, page 15. Ten years after the crisis, banks face a glut of new rules, page 61. Europe's economic boom will not last; it had better make the most of it: Free exchange, page 66

Cheesonomics When it comes to trade barriers, cheese takes the biscuit, page 65
